A Deadly Secret. Paris is still engaged in talking and speculating about M. Turpin's invention of a deadly engine of war, capable of wiping out an entire army in a quarter of an hour or so. It will be remem-Manufacturers of bered that a few days ago three Parisian journalists who had followed M. Turpin toBrussels persuaded him togive up all the plans of his invention for the good of France, and returning to Paris lodged the documents in the war office, greatly, it is said, to M. Dupuy's relief and satisfaction. Until some official report is made on the subject M. Turpin's alleged invention will doubtless remain shrouded in mystery, but mean-while speculation is rife. People are asking one another whether Turpin has really invented what he says he has, the traitor, whether he is not himself scheme, or whether the whole affair
